Relative clauses

- Divide the class into four groups. Tell the students to cut up the cards. Make sure students in group 1 use card A, students in group 2 use card B, etc.
- Tell the students to look at the pictures. Allow time for the group members to make sure they all know the words. They should do this without students from other groups hearing them.
- Then regroup the students so that each new group has one student with card A, one with card B, one with C and one with D.
- In groups, students play 'Taboo' by describing the items on their card without saying the name of the item. For example, A It's a person who films for TV programmes. (A cameraman.); B It's a place that has water on all sides. (An island.) The groups can race each other to guess the six items first, or set a time limit and tell each group to count the words they guess correctly.

Verbs + gerund / infinitive; what clauses

- Ask the students to read through the statements and then to write two more in the blank spaces at the bottom.
- Demonstrate with a stronger student how to make appropriate questions to find out the information. For example, in the first statement the question could be: Do you like / hate shopping?
- Tell the students that the column for extra information is very important. Check that they can make a follow-up question. For example, What can't you stand about shopping? What do you enjoy about learning English? When do you hope to go to the cinema this week?
- When you are confident that the students understand the task, tell them they must speak to as many classmates as possible.
- Set a time limit and ask students to stand up and ask each other the questions.
- When they have completed the task, ask some students what they found out about their classmates. Encourage them to use what clauses. For example, What Mario remembers about buying his first CD is that it was very expensive.

 You could extend this task by asking students to write a summary of their extra information.

Reported speech

 Divide the class into groups of four. You can also have groups of three with only one

- parent.
- Tell the students to imagine an English speaker is coming to stay in their home for two weeks. Discuss what problems may arise. Ask them if their parents speak English well.
- Tell the students to choose a role within the group and give the students time to understand and think about their role.
- Allow all the students with the same role to discuss the role and make notes.
- Tell the students they have ten minutes to do the roleplay. Monitor closely and help when needed. Make sure the students who chose role A use reported speech when they interpret the parents' comments. For example, My father asked if you had a good journey. My mother would like to know if you need any towels.
- If time allows, repeat the roleplay but change the students' roles so that those who were speaking L1 (the parents) get a chance to do the more challenging roles.

- Tell the students to cut up the cards. Ensure each student chooses two or three of them.
- Form a circle with the students. Tell them you are going to make up a story as a class.
- Tell the students that they must use the words on one of the cards as they're telling the story.
- Start the story and, if possible, connect it to a topic you want to revise from a previous class. Tell the students that it doesn't matter how absurd the story is. As you say the words on your card, hold it up to show the class. The student on your right must then continue the same story, using the words on one of their cards.
- Continue round the circle until all the students have added to the story and used a card.
- If time allows, make up two or three stories with the class so that they use all their cards.

Future perfect; future continuous; time expressions

- Tell the students they are going to think about their future, the future of the world and the future of a friend or famous person. They should specify who the friend / famous person is.
- Focus on the worksheet and ask the students to think about the future. They should make notes in the different sections and time zones. Give some examples: In two years' time I'll have left school. By 2070 we'll have used up most of the world's resources. Ten years from now Antonia will be living in London and working in a bank.
- When the students have made notes, divide the class into groups of three or four and ask them to tell each other about their predictions.

- Tell the students to cut up the cards.
- Ask the students how they usually find out about what's happening in the news.
- Ask them if they can remember any strange or unusual news items they've heard recently. Give some examples of your own (include the past perfect continuous tense). For example, A group of miners was rescued today from a mine in Tasmania. They had been waiting for a week to be rescued. Encourage students to ask you questions about the event.
- Divide the class into pairs or groups of three and tell them they are going to invent a news story.

- Tell each pair or group to choose an opening line card and a time card. Set a time limit for the students to plan the story around the line and then ask different groups to tell the rest of the class their news story.
- As an extension activity, stronger students could write up the story as a news article.

- Tell students to cut up the cards.
- Ask the students what jobs they'd like to do in the future and ask them how they could start to prepare themselves for their dream jobs.
- Show the students one of the careers advice cards and elicit answers to fill the gaps. For - example, If you want to be a pop star you should have singing lessons. You could learn to play an instrument. It's a good idea to start a band with friends ...

- Divide the class into groups of three or four. Ask the students to complete the cards in their groups. They should choose four more jobs for the blank cards.
- When they have finished, ask each group to read out the advice on one or more of their cards, without saying what the job is. The other groups have to guess.
- This could lead to a discussion to see if the groups agree with each other's careers advice.

Phrasal verbs

Divide the class into groups of four or five.
 Ask two students in each group to cut out and make one dice each.

- Demonstrate the activity by asking a stronger student to roll a dice and to make a sentence using the phrasal verb that comes up.
- The students take it in turns to roll one of their dice. They get one point for each correct sentence.
- When the activity is finished, ask the groups to roll both dice. Two members of the group have to make a quick dialogue using both the phrasal verbs. It may help students if you give them a starting point such as at the airport or in the supermarket.
- As an extension activity, students could make their own dice with other phrasal verbs.
- The dice could also be used to create circle stories. This could be done as a class activity, or in groups. Students take it in turns to roll a dice and to make an interesting sentence with the phrasal verb that comes up. The next student has to make another sentence to continue the story, and so on.
- The dice could also be used to play a guessing game. One student sits with their back to the class. The other students roll the dice and have to define the phrasal verb so the student with their back to the group guesses the phrasal verb on the dice.

Question tags

- Divide the class into groups of three or four and tell the students to write sentences with question tags in the speech bubbles. Monitor and check they are using the question tags correctly.
- Ask each group to read out their speech bubbles one by one. The other groups have to guess which picture each one belongs to. The first group to guess correctly gets a point.
- Stronger classes could be shown how we often use question tags to express sarcasm.
 For example, in picture 8, the sentence could be, They look really poor, don't they?
- As an extension activity, stronger students could be asked to draw a new situation with a speech bubble for the others to complete.
- Alternatively, copy and cut up one set of cards (enlarged, if possible) or use an overhead projector. Divide the class into four groups and show the pictures one at a time. The first group to think of a suitable sentence and question tag gets a point.

Indirect questions

- Tell the students they are reporters for a local radio / TV station and they are going to collect vox pops about topics of their choice. Explain that vox pops are short interviews that are usually carried out on the street or in a public place to gather public opinion about a topic. They are often used on radio broadcasts or TV programmes.
- Brainstorm possible topics as a class. Ask the students to complete questions 1–3 and then to write one extra question for 4. Encourage them to write controversial questions that will provoke discussion.
- Monitor and check that the students are forming the questions correctly.
- Divide the class into two groups: reporters and passers-by. The reporters should have their questionnaire with them.

- Tell the passers-by to walk around the class as if they are walking along the street. The reporters have to stop the passers-by, ask them their questions and write their answers on the questionnaire.
- After a set time, the students change roles.
- When all the questionnaires have been completed, students report back to the class the more interesting answers.

Participle clauses; didn't need to I needn't have

 Ask the students to imagine they are travelling abroad for six months. Choose an exotic location that will appeal to most of your students.

- Tell them the best way to keep in touch with family and friends is by writing a weblog.
 They are in a town with an Internet café so they are going to update their blog.
- Tell the students to use the information on the top half of the page to write an update on their weblog on the bottom half of the page. Their blogs might include, for example, Thanks to everyone for your emails. It's great to get news from home. Mum and Dad, you sounded worried in your message last week. You don't need to worry about me, I'm having a great time and taking care. Thanks too for the magazines you sent. You needn't have sent them though as they sell them here!
- Encourage the students to use participle clauses to describe the events. For example, Having arrived at the island, we had a picnic and a monkey stole some food. Having eaten my sandwiches, I was attacked by mosquitoes! Snorkelling with the fish, I saw the amazing underwater world. Having watched the sunset, I played the quitar.

Passive report structures

- Divide the class into two groups. Ask each student in one group to use card A and each student in the other group to use card B.
- Give the groups time to prepare their roles.
 Encourage group B (the presidents) to think of some further questions they could ask the investigator. For example, they could find out more about the local family.
- Monitor group A (the investigators) and encourage them to use passive report structures. For example, It is believed that oil supplies will run out ... There is thought to be no clean water in rural areas ... Check that group B (the presidents) are forming their questions correctly. For example, When will the oil supplies run out? How many people don't have clean water?
- When both groups are ready, make A and B pairs. They then roleplay the meeting between the president and the investigator.
- When the activity is finished, ask some of the presidents to report back to the class what they have learned from the investigators.
 Make sure they use passive report structures as far as possible.
- As an extension activity, the students could write up the investigator's findings as a report to be given to the president.

 Ask them to practise saying the expression with exaggerated intonation to express disbelief.
- Students play the game in groups of three or four. They should use a coin, not a dice, to move around the board. (Heads = two spaces, tails = one space.)
- When they land on a square, the person on their right has to ask them the question in the role of an angry parent, Why on earth ...?
- The student on that square has to try and justify why they were doing whatever it is.
 They should use the language in the speech bubbles to help them talk their way out of the situation. Ask a stronger pair to demonstrate:
 - A: Why on earth haven't you tidied your room for six months?

B: In order not to waste valuable studying time.

Set a time limit of one minute for this. If they succeed, they stay where they are. If not, they move back a square.
